Abstract

The International Socialists existed from 1968 -1986 in the U.S. with national headquarters in Detroit, and branches in 14 other cities. It was preceded by the Independent Socialist Club, established in Berkley in 1964, which then formed an International Socialist Committee. The International Socialist Club appealed to radical student and Maoist groups. Kim Moody, contributor of several pivotal writings to the socialist cause, helped to establish a branch of the Independent Socialist Club in New York. The Independent Socialist Club became the International Socialists at the 1969 convention, where a formal political platform was established to address the working class movement. Internal disagreements developed around degrees of radicalization and basic philosophy throughout the 1970's. These disagreements led to the formation of other organizations such as the Revolutionary Tendency and Workers Power. In 1986, International Socialists merged with Workers Power and Socialist Unity to become known as Solidarity.

The records in this collection illustrate the evolution of the political principles and internal workings of the International Socialists, mainly through the 1970's. It shows their struggle for the rights of the working class, to reap the recognition and rewards it felt it deserved for providing the sweat of industrial production, the basis of the nation's wealth.

Series I: Office Files, 1952-1985

Contains convention documents and agendas, resulting commentaries on convention outcomes, various meetings, and notes, especially from the Executive Committee and National Committee. There are materials on the Women's Commission, Black Commission, and IS branch reports, as well as speeches, educational materials, position papers, and discussion documents. Materials are from mainly 1972-1985, yet there are documents as early as 1950's from the Socialist Youth League and publications as early as 1936. Please note the 1970 convention documents for International Socialists philosophical position statements. Very few last names are used; often dates and meeting locations are left out of documents for security purposes.

Series II: Publications, 1936-1985

Contains newsletters, pamphlets, newspapers, articles, critiques, bulletins, and other materials for intended distribution. Researchers may find handwritten notes interspersed within various publications. Folders are titled according to publication name, subject, or format.
