Biographical / Historical

Few Detroit photographers are as beloved as photojournalist J. Edward Bailey III (1923-1982). Born in 1923 and orphaned at age 2, Bailey was raised by his grandparents and aunt on Detroit's East Side. His interest in photography started when he was a student at Northern High School and received his first Leica camera from his aunt. After graduation in 1942, Bailey briefly attended Morehouse College before entering military service. In France, Bailey served in the U.S. Army as a staff photographer for Seine Quartermaster Base Section. After the war, he studied art, sculpture, and painting at the Paris School of Arts. On his return to Detroit, Bailey studied sociology, journalism, and business administration at Wayne State University, while working the nightshift at Lincoln-Mercury factory.

In the late 1940s, Bailey started a small personal photography business, which focused largely on portraits, christenings, weddings, and other family activities. In 1952, a photo he took of Josephine Baker at the Michigan Theater won a Life magazine photo contest and launched a robust, freelance photography career. One of the few Black photojournalists that had national influence during the midcentury, Bailey's work frequently appeared in Time, where he was the primary photographer for Detroit assignments, as well as Ebony, Fortune, Jet, and Life magazines. His commercial client list included the Big Three (Chrysler, Ford Motor Co., and General Motors), National Bank of Detroit, IBM, and Dow Chemical.

Bailey had several major exhibits during his life, including "The City Within," a candid and moving view of life in Detroit's inner city in the aftermath of Detroit's 1967 rebellion. Displayed at the Detroit Institute of Arts in 1969, it is credited as being the first exhibit by a Black photographer in a major museum in the United States. In 1976, Bailey coordinated and shot "Living Legends in Black," a portfolio of 200 influential Black men and women commissioned for the nation's Bicentennial and exhibited at the Detroit Historical Museum.

Bailey's considerable influence extended beyond the printed page--he was also an educator who inspired a generation of photographers by teaching photojournalism at Wayne State University and writing a weekly photography column for The Detroit News. J. Edward Bailey III died November 8, 1982.

Content Description

The J. Edward Bailey III Photographs contains both standard and oversized (OS) black and white photo prints, OS proof sheets, b/w photo negatives, and color transparencies. Examples of both his personal and commercial work are present, including select imagery used in Bailey's exhibits "The City Within" (Detroit Institute of Arts, 1969), and "Patient Care," (Detroit Bank and Trust Co., 1972) over 200 photo prints that focused on the professional teams involved in medical care, medical research, and medical education. Of particular interest are proof sheets that show the adjacent frames to images used in "The City Within."

^ Return to Table of Contents

Arrangement

The collection is divided into two series, based on format - Series 1: Photographs (Boxes 1-4, Drawer 15) and Series 2: Negatives (Box 5).

Materials are arranged by subject in rough alphabetical order and by photographer's code when present.
